Fly Hard Patrick D. Gallaher

Thousands of feet above the earth, fighter planes twist and turn across the sky like a swarm of angry hornets. Firey lines of tracers and missiles streak through the air in every direction as the opposing aviators fight to kill each other. Amidst the chaos, one fighter pilot fights for his own survival. Tracers zip past his canopy. He turns his aircraft hard to get away, the G forces pressing against his body with such stress that he blacks out. He regains conciousness just in time to see an enemy fighter directly in front of him. The fighter pilot quickly puts the enemy machine in his sights and fires. His firepower impacts the aircraft, setting it on fire. The plane flies in a straight line for a few hundred yards then explodes in a massive fireball, raining debris down over the area. This is the kind of intensity that combat pilots throughout history have experienced since fighter planes first took to the air. Now you're in the cockpit as we experience some of the most explosive air battles ever fought. Throttle up, check six, and Fly Hard.
