Normativity And Empirical Research In Theology (Empirical Studies in Theology)

This book deals with the religious lives of Jews in the Roman world from late Second Temple times to the Later Roman Empire. The studies collected here analyse a series of issues important in the development of Judaism in this period: the role of the Temple and pilgrimage in the first century CE; the attitude of Jews to the physical texts of the Torah and to the scribes who produced them; the extent of variety and change within Judaism before and after 70 CE and the nature of the evidence for particular types of Judaism; the role of synagogues and images in Jewish worship; and, relations between Jews and Christians in the early centuries. The book should be particularly useful to students of ancient Judaism and those interested in Christian origins.
